EDUC 118. INTERNATIONAL EDUCATION. (3 Credits)

This course is designed to introduce students to international education, a broad concept with many interpretations and manifestations. The course will consist of two inter-related halves: comparative education and an introduction to the International Baccalaureate (IB) curriculum that is prevalent in international schools. The first half of the course focuses on international comparative education whereby students will investigate and compare different educational systems around the world. They will learn about the various guidelines for education worldwide, different educational structures, and the contexts in which these systems exist. For the second half of the course, students will be introduced to the IB curriculum, take part in developing an IB unit plan for their desired grade level and subject area, and practice using IB assessment tools. Students who complete the course will have a deeper and more complex understanding of other forms of schooling and acquire a foundation in teaching in the IB curriculum as practiced in most international schools (the most likely site of employment for U.S. teachers teaching abroad).

Level: Non Degree Coursework, Undergraduate

EDUC 143. LANGUAGE AND CULTURE. (3 Credits)

This course facilitates the exploration of three critical questions: 1. In what ways to language and culture influence one's identity? 2. How does culture influence communication? 3. How can an understanding of issues of culture inform communication on both personal and professional levels? In addressing these questions, the course will introduce students to the field of intercultural communication and take them through a journey of greater understanding of self and the "cultural other". In terms of culture, the course will focus on facilitating a shift beyond the view of culture as a collection of holidays, exotic foods, and interesting costumes. Rather, it will allow students to gain a more in-depth understanding of the components of culture, both in general and in specific, and to examine the powerful role that culture plays in all facets of life, with a focus on (future) professional settings. Similarly, the nature and role of different types of language (e.g., languages, dialects, accents, expressions, words) will be examined in order to understand their influence on identity and communication. The inextricable relationship between language and culture will be illuminated throughout the course.

EDUC 162. URBAN EDUCATION IMMIGRATION. (3 Credits)

This course explores the complexities of how immigration impacts urban education. According to Rong & Brown (2002, one in ten U.S. children was born outside of the United States, and one in five live in a household headed by an immigrant. Approximately 1,000 immigrant children enter schools each day. While immigration is not reserved for urban contexts, the Current Population Report (Lollock, 2001), found that almost half of the foreign born lived in a central part of a city in metropolitan areas (45%), compared with slightly more than one quarter of the native population (27.5%) For many immigrant children and families, schools are the first American institution they must negotiate. In this course, we will review research that centers immigrant children - in hopes of learning from them how they experience schools. We will discuss challenges that students face including dislocation, cultural disorientation, language learning, and racism. In addition, we will analyze the issue of immigration in the larger context of globalization. Finally, we will explore opportunities for educating immigrant children in urban contexts - with the possibility of schools as sites for humanization and social transformation.

Secondary reading teachers face different challenges in literacy development than their elementary counterparts - issues of student motivation and engagement, high-interest materials, gender and ethnic biases, inclusion, and making meaningful connections to adolescent lives. Through a theoretical grounding in adolescent physical, social, emotional, and cognitive development, students will discover and discuss the policies and strategies that impact the literacy development of secondary readers. The selection of materials, the planning of rich literacy lessons, enhancing motivation, and creating an inclusive environment will be aligned with the unique needs of a variety of adolescent learners. In addition, students will prepare and plan specific teaching and learning strategies to counter variables that cause a decrease in adolescent literacy performance and engagement.

EDUC 183. SOCIAL CONTEXT FOR URBAN SCHOOLS. (3 Credits)

This course provides students with an introduction to urban education. We engage the philosophical, social, economic, and political contexts of urban schooling. We begin by examining the utility and demarcation of space (e.g., urban, suburban, rural, etc.). We then explore historical and contemporary understandings of the notion of "urban," focusing on how "urban" has been constructed and evolves over time. We focus on the impact on schools and communities, in particular, urban educational reform and pedagogical strategies. In addition, we engage the intersections of urban education with questions of political economy, immigration, militarization, and racism. Finally, we discuss how students experience urban schools - the challenges they may face in urban contexts as well as practices of hope and humanization.

This course provides students with an introduction to the study of youth, culture, and society, focusing on urban contexts. This course will examine youth and adolescence as a historically and culturally specific social formation. We will engage and discuss the construction of youth at the intersection of larger social forces (e.g. racial, cultural, social, economic, gender, and political contexts) that impact and shape their lives. Using multiple ideological and representational understandings of young people that situate youth and youth cultural practices within global and local processes. Specific topics include the commodification and commercialization of youth culture in both urban and suburban spaces; popular culture and media representations, incarceration, consumerism, sexuality, and social movements; and the multiple ways in which youth negotiate, resist, and distrust their identities.

EDUC 218. INTERNATIONAL EDUCATION. (3 Credits)

This course is designed to introduce students to international education, a broad concept with many interpretations and manifestations. The course will consist of two inter-related halves: comparative education and an introduction to the International Baccalaureate (IB) curriculum that is prevalent in international schools. The first half of the course focuses on international comparative education whereby students will investigate and compare different educational systems around the world. They will learn about the various guidelines for education worldwide, different educational structures, and the contexts in which these systems exist. For the second half of the course, students will be introduced to the IB curriculum, take part in developing an IB unit plan for their desired grade level and subject area, and practice using IB assessment tools. Students who complete the course will have a deeper and more complex understanding of other forms of schooling and acquire a foundation in teaching in the IB curriculum as practiced in most international schools (the most likely site of employment for U.S. teachers teaching abroad).

This course is part of the Professional block in the School of Education. It focuses on proven National Science Education Standards and methods for the effective teaching of science in the elementary grades.

Constructivist learning theories are examined and applied through peer lesson planning and teaching. Drake students also develop science lessons and teach them to elementary students in Des Moines area schools. Following reflection and enhancement, the lessons are then converted to web-based portfolios and shared with the teaching profession. Prereq.: EDUC 203 and acceptance to the Teacher Education Program.

This course facilitates the exploration of three critical questions: 1. In what ways to language and culture influence one's identity? 2. How does culture influence communication? 3. How can an understanding of issues of culture inform communication on both personal and professional levels? In addressing these questions, the course will introduce students to the field of intercultural communication and take them through a journey of greater understanding of self and the "cultural other". In terms of culture, the course will focus on facilitating a shift beyond the view of culture as a collection of holidays, exotic foods, and interesting costumes. Rather, it will allow students to gain a more in-depth understanding of all facets of life, with a focus on (future) professional settings. Similarly, the nature and role of different types of language (e.g., languages, dialects, accents, expressions, words) will be examined in order to understand their influence on identity and communication. The inextricable relationship between language and culture will be illuminated throughout the course.

EDUC 245. INTRODUCTION TO TEACHING ENGLISH LANGUAGE LEARNERS. (3 Credits)

In the context of the nation's increasingly diverse K-12 classrooms, all teachers must know how to effectively teach language and content to English language learners (ELLs) in order to facilitate equal access to core curriculum. In this introductory class, specific areas of study include factors that influence second language learning, second language acquisition, the structure of language, programming for ELLs, classroom and large-scale assessment, instructional strategies (focused on sheltered instruction), and the use of technology in language teaching. A variety of materials, activities, and resources will be used to facilitate learning of key concepts in each of these areas.

EDUC 262. URBAN EDUCATION IMMIGRATION. (3 Credits)

This course explores the complexities of how immigration impacts urban education. According to Rong & Brown (2002), one in ten U.S. children was born outside of the United States, and one in five live in a household headed by an immigrant. Approximately 1,000 immigrant children enter schools each day. While immigration is not reserved for urban contexts, the Current Population Report (Lollock, 2001), found that almost half of the foreign born lived in a central part of a city in metropolitan areas (45%), compared with slightly more than one quarter of the native population (27.5%). For many immigrant children and families, schools are the first American institution they must negotiate. In this course, we will review research that centers immigrant children - in hopes of learning from them how they experience schools. We will discuss challenges that students face including dislocation, cultural disorientation, language learning, and racism. In addition, we will analyze the issue of immigration in the larger context of globalization. Finally, we will explore opportunities for educating immigrant children in urban contexts - with the possibility of schools as sites for humanization and social transformation.

An historical, social, and cultural analysis of the interrelationships among racial, ethnic, class, and gender experiences, in conjunction with an examination of the individual, institutional and social constructs of prejudice discrimination, and stereotyping. The course will, through its comparative approach, aim to increase understanding of race, ethnic, and gender identity, and sensitize students to the subjective experience of marginalized groups. Case studies will augment the course content for direct application to the development of instructional programs. There will be an emphasis on African Americans, Latinos, Native Americans, Asian Americans, gender, sexual orientation, class structure, and the disabled. A 10-hour service-learning component in a social service organization is required. This course meets the diversity standards for teachers as outlined by the Iowa Department of Education.

EDUC 271. ISSUES IN ADOLESCENT LITERACY. (3 Credits)

Secondary reading teachers face different challenges in literacy development than their elementary counterparts - issues of student motivation and engagement, high-interest materials, gender and ethnic biases, inclusion, and making meaningful connections to adolescent lives. Through a theoretical grounding in adolescent physical, social, emotional, and cognitive development, students will discover and discuss the policies and strategies that impact the literacy development of secondary readers. The selection of materials, the planning of rich literacy lessons, enhancing motivation, and creating an inclusive environment will be aligned with the unique needs of a variety of adolescent learners. In addition, students will prepare and plan specific teaching and learning strategies to counter variables that cause a decrease in adolescent literacy performance and engagement.

This course will examine the effects of poverty on students, teachers, schools, and communities. Through this study, students will learn how poverty affects the brain and what teachers can do in their classrooms to lessen the impact. Participants will examine characteristics of 90-90-90 schools and create research-based action plans to increase the odds for success in their classrooms.

EDUC 283. SOCIAL CONTEXT FOR URBAN SCHOOLS. (3 Credits)

This course provides students with an introduction to urban education. We engage the philosophical, social economic, and political contexts of urban schooling. We begin by examining the utility and demarcation of space (e.g., urban, suburban, rural, etc.). We then explore historical and contemporary understandings of the notion of "urban," focusing on how "urban" has been constructed and evolves over time. We focus on the impact on schools and communities, in particular, urban educational reform and pedagogical strategies. In addition, we engage the intersections of urban education with questions of political economy, immigration, militarization, and racism. Finally, we discuss how students experience urban schools - the challenges they may face in urban contexts as well as practices of hope and humanization.

EDUC 286. YOUTH, CULTURE, AND SOCIETY. (3 Credits)

This course provides students with an introduction to the study of youth, culture, and society, focusing on urban contexts. This course will examine youth and adolescence as a historically and culturally specific social formation. We will engage and discuss the construction of youth at the intersection of larger social forces (e.g. racial, cultural, social, economic, gender, and political contexts) that impact and shape their lives. Using multiple texts, writing assignments, and reflective practices, students will examine and interrogate ideological and representational understandings of young people that situate youth and youth cultural practices within global and local processes. Specific topics include the commodification and commercialization of youth culture in both urban and suburban spaces; popular culture and media representations, incarceration, consumerism, sexuality, and social movements; and the multiple ways in which youth negotiate, resist, and disrupt their identities.

This one unit class will survey the needs and accomplishments of special populations of gifted learners. Special populations will include culturally diverse students: African American, ethnic minority and other underserved populations. Twice-exceptional gifted learners will include the learning disabled, gay, rural and gifted dropouts. One segment of the class will discuss the special needs and accomplishments of gifted female learners. The class will first address the characteristics of these groups, explore strategies for identifying these students and then discuss alternative means of meeting their needs in the cognitive and affective domains.
